

Aesthetic Diary. April 27th.

B is a mother, married, and owns a newly launched fashion brand

Balance in my life today / Motherhood. Art. Entrepreneurship.

Some acknowledgements B has done, while being engaged with painting the picture to express balance in her present situation:

“Motherhood is not at all my thing. It is getting better already, as my kid is almost 4, not a baby any more.

I have had anxieties; now it is much better. My relationship is better than it ever has been.

I have pushed negative people out of my life. I just can't communicate with them. I am very sensitive.

I had a complicated childhood. Today I totally admire my mom. She is my best partner. She is the best; I can rely on her for everything.

I am always doubting everything; I do not have confidence. I know it comes from childhood; from moments when I felt unworthy. I cannot make decisions; for instance, sometimes I think it would be reasonable to make some simple products that would make better sales, but I just can't make them. I do not want to make any compromises in my creation; I do not want to make things that are not unique. Being an entrepreneur is so complicated. I really have doubts about my products; somehow I refuse to make common stuff, though sometimes I think I should do it to reach the masses.

As you can see, nothing is in balance here. There is this one line; this is me, and I am moving somewhere. I do not know exactly where, but I am in progress. And then there is this motherhood thing, which is a really vague area for me, and entrepreneurship, which I should become better at. But art is everywhere. Creativity is always with me.
